

I really need to spend time getting ahead on more “long-term” goals that aren’t quite so long-term anymore, but it’s kind of difficult to find the time beyond just getting by doing the things I need to do on a weekly basis.

I still need to pick out songs for the Christmas tree lighting—I was thinking it would be a good idea to have them picked out by rehearsal next week and that would give us four rehearsals to work on them.

As far as thinking about the transition to a guitar accompaniment vs a piano accompaniment, I didn’t make too much progress on that this week. Although, our guitarist is going to take the reins on one of the songs for adoration tonight, no piano. It’s just Lily and I (and kind of J. Paul) singing, though, so that makes it much easier than with more people in the choir.

Next Sunday, J. Paul will be out again—he’s leading all the music for fall retreat this weekend, so he has charge of that and I have charge of Mass on Sunday. So I need to make sure I think about the most efficient way to lead rehearsal tomorrow to make sure everything goes smoothly.
